

Enlight selected to construct student suitability testing for the Swedish National Agency for Higher Education

Following a public procurement exercise the Swedish National Agency for Higher Education has chosen Enlight to deliver a new entrance test for applicants for educations within health- and medical-care. The project will start immediately and be delivered in phases through autumn 2009.

The Swedish National Agency for Higher Education is the central agency that deals with issues affecting universities and higher education institutions in Sweden. The agency provides data for decision-making in order to change, improve and renew the educational activities within the sector of higher education. The aim of the new test is to measure knowledge, skills and abilities that are considered important for the suitability of students within health- and medical-care. The purpose is to find the most suitable amongst the qualified applicants. It will be an instrument that higher education institutions and universities can use in their work in recruiting students.

"This is a prestigious assignment for us and we are very pleased that the Swedish National Agency for Higher Education has chosen Enlight as supplier", comments Erik Hult, CEO of Enlight. "It is an acknowledgement that we are one of the premier suppliers of professional expertise within the fields of psychometrics and examination", he continues. "We have the capacity to deliver tests and certifications with high standards of quality and security, and often to tight time deadlines. The assessment from the Swedish National Agency for Higher Education clearly states that Enlight has a model for quality assurance and project planning that is highly competitive compared to other companies", finishes Erik Hult.
